Excerpt: . . . the wheels of carriages from chafing their angles. Flapping posts are set in the ground at proper places to prevent the gates from opening too far, and straining the hinges j these posts are about two feet and a half above the ground, and two feet in it. Catches or clicks are let into these posts, to hold the gates open when thrown back; these catches project about two inches from the side of the posts, and turn on a pin within the post, the inner end of the catch being made heavier than the outer, and always throws that end up, and by that means it takes hold of the bottom of the lower bar of the gate, by a notch cut in it for that purpose: by making the catches in this way, they are out of the reach of injury. In the common way they are put on the top of the posts, from which they project six or seven inches; in consequence of which they are frequently torn off by wheels of carriages and waggon. LAMPS. All toll-gates should be well lighted; and for this purpose nothing is better than a lamp made similar to the best coach lamp, with powerful reflectors, and large air holes. The gates at Coventry, and most of those in North Wales, are lighted by lamps of this description, which are found to be economical, and to answer every purpose. These lamps are about nine...
